not look at the sun. Here we could for several days without being disturbed, and that was the case. As I can remember, there was a large and irregular, and two small and round. However, that man appeared to give us a little help, and at times the cold was very intense indeed.

We experienced a little change at first from the fact that two of the ships which had been sailing alongside of us had escaped clear away before the peak became solid. No wonder our ship was a little "chilled" as he called it, for those two vessels would get off to the old sailing and return home "humped ships."

There were only left, therefore, the Mahua lying away to the north, and the Eclair, and an American ship four or five miles to the east. But we could just make out the masts of a foreigner to the north-west.

For the first eight or ten days of our imprisonment we had the society of birds and beasts; the gulls were constantly wheeling round us, and the bears offered us every excellent sport.

I will have more to say about birds in subsequent chapters. I am fond of sport myself, but there are two kinds of it, even as regards bears, legitimate and illegitimate. I regard the latter as a crime of the first order. I would give an example of each. Our second mate in the Mahua was a tall, dark, man, with a hair and a face about the colour of ender from exposure to wind and waves. He was a good man and a good Christian, but quite and completely unacquainted with the ways of the north.

"I'm just a fisherman," he would say, and nothing else.

The first mate used to put a piece of him in the fire, and the agent of that would often bring a bear or two down towards us. Then the activity of our second mate was marvellous. In a few minutes he would be armed and even the side and legging over towards the boat, guided by the skipper's fan from the north-east. Of course, some of us would follow up, but he did not really want us.

This man had no fear of him, but he had no more than a faint idea of what he was fighting a bear single-handed, with a small club alone, than he would a bladder-blowed (Siamese) crabs, which, as I myself know from experience, is a fearful, impatient, and terrible beast. He was engaged, and just like a Paddy at Donnybrook Fair, always pulling for a fight. This fisherman-sailor was an excellent shot, and as cool as a cucumber in his fight. He got down behind a bit of ice or a hump, and drew a head upon an advancing bear, that bear would meet assuredly die, unless he had made his will beforehand.

A bear more easily killed than a seal. A seal is exceedingly tenacious of life. If your bullet goes through his head or heart, or through the neck close behind the head you have him; if not, he will scuffle off. I have taken bullets from the lungs of a seal, and they must have been there for years, and I have seen the heart of a seal taken out after the beast was shot through the skull, and laid on the snow, and counted its beats for thirty seconds.

But the second mate could not bear to look upon a bear with more than one hole in it. If there were several, then, "That poor bear," he would say, "was never given a shot." He was cruelly murdered. This is my own opinion too, and it is a cruel and unchristian act. A bear, fighting him single-handed, he ought to go home and learn to shoot. This is British fairplay.

Now for illegitimate shooting, which is a cruel sport. Here is a short account of one such case. As a comparison are also, may be needless. "A party came across a polar bear. When first seen the animal was not more than half a mile away, sitting on a large block of ice, looking at the vessel, and in the distance of the ice, the boatman that he followed it to approach with a hundred yards before taking aim; then he turned to make off."

But now a whole volley was fired at him, "by word of command," and he fell dead. No wonder, for the poor bear was murdered, and for that killed him I would not give a penny.

Here is another account of a bear adventure, from the same source. There is previous to the account about a bear, the vessel is among the ice and a few of them go on deck and see a bear, then all rush for their rifles. The honest bear is then much for his rights. The honest bear is then much for his rights. The honest bear is then much for his rights.
